

UFOLOSOPHY 1

Introduction

This text explores extrasensory beings - entities vibrating in higher dimensions - namely ufos (u-foes). Many of my writings deal with this topic, but this is a piece mainly focused on ufos. Since this subject is impossible to study scientifically, I don't attempt to prove what exists and what doesn't. There's no point in telling me it can't be that way or that it's simply impossible.

UFO is an acronym and it stands for Unintentional Flying Object. I call ufos u-foes, because I don't really know what to call them. I don't want to call them aliens or extra terrestrials. Historically these entities have been referred to as Archons. I could use that word, but for now I settle for ufo. Archons is a more specific term, referring to the malevolent gatekeepers who oversee the human world in Gnosticism. Archons torment humans. They prevent us from achieving spiritual enlightenment and escaping this Earthly realm.

Ufo is a broader term. It includes not only the Archons but also more advanced beings, and to some extent even reptilians and greys.

Guesswork Science

I don't put my faith in science. Of course, scientifically proven claims are generally more credible than religious teachings based solely on ancient texts and faith. But science is corrupted. Research funders usually get the results they want. Studies are too often influenced by ideological and political agendas, aiming for specific outcomes while opposing views are skimmed over or ignored entirely.

In school or university, students are expected to absorb the material and demonstrate their understanding. Only then can they conduct their own research, which must be based on established knowledge. To secure a job or funding, researchers have to conform to these so-called accepted truths. These same truths are reinforced by the mainstream media. If you don't subscribe to this often blatantly false narrative, you are excluded from the system and labeled a crank or conspiracy theorist.

My own "research" is mostly based on guesswork, intuition, and voices inside my head, as well as personal experiences. I don't read much about the UFO-phenomenon, extra terrestrials or humanoids, nor do I follow Internet forums or attend lectures on the subject. I try to remember how things happened and why, but my memories are often vague. In many cases it's possible that my imagination has played tricks on me.

I get hints from voices that speak to me, telling me various things and reminding me of past events. Most of the time, they lead me astray, but even then there's often a useful detail. There's nothing scientific about any of this. Perhaps people should just live human lives, without thinking about otherworldly stuff. But in my life, this phenomenon has become so significant that I feel compelled to address it through writing.

The Significance of Religious Philosophy

A truly good religion would in essence be a philosophy, something like Buddhism. Yet its teachings should remain accessible and clear. All knowledge and doctrine ought to be freely available to everyone. A priesthood or any other centralized authority is bound to fail, because no one can hand over their own spiritual understanding to another. Each individual must seek the answers to their own questions without intermediaries who claim the right to interpret truth on their behalf.

At its worst, religious authority resembles the Soviet Union Politburo and its nomenklatura: a bureaucratic elite that systematically subjugates and persecutes ordinary people. Iran's ayatollahs and the Revolutionary Guard provide a modern example of this dynamic. It has long been understood that power without responsibility or transparency inevitably leads to corruption. And since, in the human world, Satanism is the only genuine religion of power, anyone who wishes to rule must in some sense participate in it. Or else be displaced by someone who does. In that light, every institutionalized faith becomes, beneath its ceremonial robes, merely another form of Satanism: corrupt and profoundly misanthropic.

But does humanity truly need religion or philosophy at all? Our prehistoric ancestors, cavemen, managed without cathedrals. And even if the Neanderthals possessed some notion of the sacred, chimpanzees certainly do not. On that basis one could argue that humanity is a divine creation. Something unique, not simply an animal that happened to evolve into intelligence. I find it hard to believe that evolution alone could transform an ape into a human being; such a notion strikes me as absurd. Some people want a religion or a philosophy, some don't. What the modern person most needs is stillness. Almost any worldview can offer a path toward it.

Buddhism demands rigorous self-discipline, concentration, and meditation. An almost total devotion to spiritual practice. Yet if everyone were to dedicate themselves wholly to contemplation, who would till the soil or trade in the markets? Since people must wrest their livelihood from their own labor, it is unrealistic to expect them to spend their scarce free time on metaphysical reflection. Especially when not all minds are suited to such pursuits.

Human beings can only ever glimpse the ultimate nature of existence in a fragmentary way. Part of the reason is that our thinking has been poisoned from an early age, making intellectual effort difficult and spiritual clarity rare. This corruption is not the individual's fault; the powers that oversee this world allow, even encourage, the poisoning of human life.

Suppose all hidden knowledge were suddenly made available to everyone. Even then, not all could use it well. True understanding takes time and discipline; many would lack the capacity to master it. Some people cannot control their own desires, yet they may be tireless and determined. If such a person gained access to forbidden knowledge, they might destroy everything around them. Still, that is no excuse to keep the world in ignorance. It is unjust to deny truth to everyone because of a few who might misuse it. Those who would do harm should simply be removed from the equation – eliminated - so that they cannot infect the world with their corruption. In the end, that would be for the good of all, even for their own.

How it Began

In the beginning - or somewhere in between - the divine beings drifted as gas clouds in an euphoric nirvana, amidst the void. Nothing was needed. They simply were. Then one of them grew bored and suggested creating a world where everyone is annoyed all the time. A place with good and evil mixed together, facts twisted and distorted. Then just watch how it unfolds on its own.

And so it was done. But thousands of worlds were born at once - each with its own laws. Some are greater, some smaller. Some overlap, others stand alone. Each world - some more real than others - was made into a circle, a looping cycle. Even the smallest amoeba can eventually overpower the mightiest dragon.

The number eight, when placed on its side, becomes the mathematical symbol for infinity. In numerology, eight carries many meanings. If it represents “the cycle of all things,” then perhaps there is significance in the way its two loops meet at the center. Maybe that point of intersection suggests the possibility of change. I won’t speculate further. For my part, I’m content with zero, the circle. It is clear, complete, and self-contained.

Dive Bar Primates

A divine project can be compared to a video game: enemies in those games follow an AI loop, strafing back and forth and attacking when they spot you. That’s exactly what these god-crafted worlds are: simulations, playable games. They’re amusing in their imperfections, yet simultaneously frustrating. You have no choice but to adapt to the prevailing conditions. Or maybe you want to change them. Some people explain their misfortune by saying they’re merely products of their environment. Others want to shape their environment into a product of their own making. Many try to change the world because they can’t change themselves.

The so-called “law of the jungle” means the stronger eats the weaker. In the animal kingdom, this is acceptable. Prey species prevent overgrowth, fertilize, and disperse seeds. Without predators, prey multiply excessively and weaken genetically. Scavengers clean up carcasses. Even mosquitoes - widely considered a plague - play a role as pollinators and bird food. Maybe they also help strengthen our immunity.

Humans, however, distinguish themselves from animals. We don't expect morality from animals, though we are said to descend from apes, so in that sense we are animals. Did humans descend from animals, or are we a separate creation - some kind of hybrid? According to science, it took apes ten million years to evolve into humans, but on the other hand, it's well known that it only takes ten beers for a human to regress back into an ape.

If humans evolved from apes, why do apes still exist? Did they stagnate in their evolution because they are reactionaries? You don't even have to remain static to fall behind in the world; slowing down is enough. Let alone longing for the past and reversing your way back to the monkey house. It is possible to get there. If you need proof, just visit some Finnish dive bar, where cheap beer fuels a distorted cacophony and general mayhem flourishes.

Satan's Realm

Our known world is limited to Earth. I don't believe moon landings are real because I happen to know the Moon is not what it appears - it's teeming with life and Blade Runner - style metropolises. Perhaps a human group reached the Moon, but none returned - for security reasons alone. The Moon was built by negative extraterrestrial beings. It's full of them and it's not a place for humans.

This known world is satanic. Like nearly all other worlds from which body-snatcher orcs come to torment us. But the "other side" - from where ufos (also created by gods) control us - is inherently positive compared to this world's negativity. Orcs can't reach there. Yet even there, many beings are malevolent and arrogant personalities. They could thrive on negativity like this world's leaders: Satan and his fallen angels, or whatever they are. But they don't necessarily live off it. Of course, there are different kinds of ufos. Yet the ones that influence this world are not good or evil as such. They are negative, positive, or neutral.

Earth is Satan's realm. But it can be guided from the outside, if desired. Often, it isn't. Free will keeps the show interesting and allows self-driven development. But to survive here you have to act ruthlessly. And once you do, you're stuck. To escape, you must defy your nature and the jungle laws. But it's never that simple; it's far more complicated. Most people are reduced to animals, only capable of consuming the weaker. With such people, soft values won't help - you must be hard.

As humans, we don't understand the world of deities or ufos. I know little about ufos myself, but I don't understand them. We people don't understand everything about ants, either. Beings vary in capability, but one doesn't usually understand how dumb he is.

Formative Lives

Ufos are those who can control us and significantly influence our lives. We don't see their world, but they see us. Some watch us like we watch Big Brother on TV. Others sit in monitoring centers. Some simply don't care.

There are many kinds of ufos. Though often positively charged entities, they don't necessarily harbor goodwill toward humans. Their stance can be neutral. Some don't help anyone and act only in their own interest. Some may be helpful, but that help often manifests as complication for humans. What's beneficial in the long run is subjective. Without adversity, humans grow weak and dull; too many problems breed bitterness.

Wealthy people can solve their problems by buying their way out. That is not interesting or developmental. Human life must be difficult and anxiety-ridden. Perhaps those who are most tormented here go on to "heaven" after death, rather than simply passing on, or reincarnating. And this "reward" is considered valuable enough to make suffering worthwhile.

Suffering on Earth is immense. It must exist and be inflicted on others (especially on "oafy" lay-people, who don't belong to the satanic club) so the satanist gets off easier. Maybe ufos are satanists - or at least some of them are. Or perhaps some other powerful entity manipulates ufos without them even knowing about it. An entity they cannot see or even understand.

Generally, ufos are not nice - especially toward humans. Nice and easy don't drive growth. Ufo "help" is often a mountain to climb for those who want something. At the summit, you get what you wanted. And realize it wasn't worth it. You had to grow to understand this.

That said, some ufos are kind. One might take a sufferer under its wing and let them do as they wish. Money's good and life runs smoothly. Such a person often becomes arrogant and nasty - but the ufo allows it.

Some might assume that ultra-intelligent ufos are clinical and detached - but they have a sense of humor. They laugh at humans, at least. I don't know if they can laugh at themselves? Many appear grim or downright harsh. That's how angels are often portrayed: far from charming rogues. Does a ufo who punishes humans see itself as akin to a kennel owner who kicks his dogs?

The Dark Side

There are also negative and neutral entities. I call the negative ones demons. They serve the dark forces - like Satan. Demons lack warm feelings; no empathy or love. Their power comes from hate, pain, and despair. A demon may appear friendly to a human, but it's unwise to engage - whatever you gain, ultimately you lose more.

It would be simplistic to assume that a demon dislikes everyone. Toward its own kind, a demon surely behaves differently than toward a human being.

Therefore, it must be made clear that whatever is said about a ufo or a demon is said from a human perspective.

If your boss is kind and helpful to everyone else but treats you unfairly, then from your point of view, he is unjust. Even if others disagree. Say, Adolf Hitler was kind to his own dog. But if a demon is a kind of Hitler, then a human being is certainly not its dog - nor, by any means, its equal.

Here lies one of humanity's deeper problems. The human being is, in potential, a profoundly spiritual creature, yet one that has been subjugated and poisoned. A person can never truly be the equal of a demon, yet the human soul may still possess immense value. Ultimately, the human being is an animal-like entity - a sort of elevated beast, a little like a dog that has learned to speak.

Negatively charged entities are doomed to a limited status - they can't ascend to the highest states of existence. But it's easier for them to climb as high as possible within their own scope. It is still difficult. The world is full of evil beings who've attempted to rise in negative hierarchy, only to end up in a small cell for a hundred years after chickening out at the key moment. I don't think any of them are humans, for we are too soft and simplistic to compete with extraterrestrials. There are beings dumber than humans on a galactic scale, but like humans, they're confined to their own worlds.

Beings on the side of light know that it is the better side. Darkness is a short-sighted deal - like a high-interest loan that seems nice and easy at first but ends up costly. On the negative side, to climb you must embrace evil. It's a vicious cycle: kill or be killed. The greatest benefit is always skimmed for someone else.

If you're willing to do anything, the dark side offers more for less effort. On the positive side, moderation is wisdom and virtue. If you give in to excess, the only outcome is a hangover. Even the wisest sometimes drink too much in order to understand excess. But they only drink a little bit too much, and then return to their normal routine.

Disorder is not something positives harbour in their own life. Things need to be done properly and within the schedule, whereas the dark side feeds on chaos. However, at below it is accepted, because chance creates interesting outcome. This is why most of the worlds are, if not chaotic, then at the edge of it. Between static and unstable is where systems are most adaptive and creative.

Within the positive ufos, there's a fifth column: treacherous beings who sabotage their projects. Among beings greater than ufos, infiltrators are known but tolerated. Life isn't meant to be fully controlled. A bit of randomness adds both drama and authenticity. Also, mega-entities don't necessarily interfere in lower realms because then they would be partly responsible for the outcomes. Or because it simply isn't interesting for them.

Can reality ever shift for the better without a guiding hand? It is always easier to do wrong than to do right. Alone, change seems impossible. Deception and selfishness offer immediate rewards, while trust and respect are only realized over time. At the very least, a human being needs someone to point the way toward the right path; alone, they are unlikely to find it. But who, then, would guide the watchers, the ufos and demons?

Christianity and Satanism are both rooted in sacrifice. Jesus was a blood sacrifice. And like Satan, ufos also demand sacrifices. They require humans to sacrifice time and effort. Humans must suffer to achieve something - it's a game. What humans can do themselves doesn't really matter. Ufos will orchestrate things from behind the scenes. And with humans, that's usually necessary. But ufos don't like to help someone who doesn't strive to do their best.

The Lives of Others

Humans are not meant to be self-sufficient. Ufos don't mind that people are dumbed down by fluoride - it makes them easier to control. Human ability isn't valued much. Humans are stupid anyway, but fluoridation keeps them docile - not rioting on every corner like in the Middle Ages. Also, fluoridation or mass vaccination create a chance - avoiding them gives the average person an edge. When most people dull themselves, one stands out as capable.

Ufos don't settle for observation. They intervene, create chains of events to move things forward. Everything must be difficult. Otherwise, it's not a true sacrifice. The quality of the sacrifice isn't in what is sacrificed, but in how difficult it is to achieve. If you were willing to sacrifice your life, they wouldn't accept it. They would make you do something you can't or don't want to do. Someone who could do it won't be allowed to. They will be asked to sacrifice their lives instead. Skilled and active people rarely want to sacrifice their lives since they have use for it.

Ufos aren't omnipotent. They are far more capable than we humans, yet in the end they cannot change their own world; they can only express their own essence within it. Like humans, they are both passengers and drivers on their journey. It's easier for them, too, to criticize others and tell them what they should do, rather than to change themselves. Ufos also want only the good parts of things and are happy to leave the bad to burden others. They, too, can be proud, lazy and mean.

I suspect some ufos have to live as humans at some point. They need that lesson, or they want to change something here. Or perhaps as the result of a lost bet. Naturally, they must pass through a veil of forgetfulness when entering human life and thus not recognizing themselves as mere visitors. Otherwise, they would adopt a detached attitude, and the "game of life" wouldn't feel real or entertaining to watch from above.

A ufo can also briefly visit the human world in human form. Or it can harness a parasite-orc to pilot, or maybe just hijack someone's body. Such double and triple-agent tactics could even be common. Ufo may also just manipulate someone - even a reptilian - by tweaking its thoughts.

Heavenly Creatures

Once, I briefly entered a ufo mindset. It was overwhelming. In terms of thoughts and decisions, it was layered: like five thick blankets topped by a few thin quilts.

Humans aren't wired for multitasking - it's said to cause Alzheimer's. We should focus on one thing at a time. A human would go insane with a ufo consciousness. Like Cate Blanchett's Irina Spalko in Indiana Jones and the Kingdom of the Crystal Skull.

I've also visited the so-called "Ufoland" as a human. It wasn't the base of the real influencer-ufos; rather it felt institutional. It could have been a place for the newly enlisted. Physically, it resembled a school cafeteria. Everything was white: walls, furniture and ufos' clothes. I didn't really like it.

A guide took me to someone's office. It was a cramped cubicle, ascetic but decent workspace. The guide introduced me, saying I was there just to observe. The pale-skinned ufo was at his computer. He turned his head and glanced at me with a smile.

"Jaa" he said in Finnish. It means "right" or just "uh-huh".

I watched as the ufo projected humans onto a screen, conveyor-belt style, judging each destiny in seconds. It paused on one.

"This one's interesting. Hmm... Well. Whatever."

I asked what it meant. It muttered something vague - not wanting to explain. Or maybe he was busy. In Ufoland, you toil away. It's not for loafers.

Don't get me wrong here. It wasn't that bad. People have company there and things to do without that depressing misery we have here on Earth. But I decided then that I don't want to come here. Not that I want to remain a foolish human forever, but I just don't want to sit behind a screen judging fates for mistreated human scum. I'm not built for that. I'd probably assign random humorous treatments - like forgiving a mass murderer just because he has a funny haircut.

Someone told me Ufoland is actually Heaven - a place some humans reach. Some inhabitants looked human, others didn't. Perhaps it's a shared Heaven reachable from multiple worlds.

On my next visit, I didn't realize it was the same place. This time I was outdoors in lush nature. The sun was shining in a cloudless sky. A blonde guy with a pot belly walked up in Speedos, saying he'd go swim in the nearby lake. He claimed to be Swedish, and asked if I spoke Swedish. He said he'd learned a bit of Finnish in Heaven but didn't want to speak it. Neither did I want to speak Swedish - so we spoke English. He said the place is not called Heaven - I don't remember what proper name he used.

He also said that there are some Finns and Swedes here – but more Mongolians and Central Asians. He also advised to stay in good shape, because you'd have to remain in the same body you carried on Earth. Although he could have lost weight there, too. I didn't really understand his message. How could you still suffer Earthly health problems in Heaven?

"I never imagined I'd end up in a place like this after death," he said.

But eventually life had become routine.

"Do you ever feel down here?" I asked in Finnish.

"No, not down," he replied in decent Finnish. "I understand what you mean. But sometimes you secretly wish you would. You kind of got used to that feeling over time."

"Anything else?" he asked after a pause.

Perhaps there was, but nothing came to mind. He seemed somewhat bothered, so I let him be. He waved and walked down to the lake. He dove headfirst into the shimmering blue lake.

I walked across the meadow toward a hill where two women sat. I approached them and they smiled enigmatically.

"Where can I find booze in here?" I asked.

I don't remember the conversation, but I do remember finding a bar and getting a drink. It wasn't great, but I got wasted anyway. It felt natural. I couldn't approach my visit to Heaven as an opportunity to explore its true nature. I was casually disinterested. It was the same detached attitude I had with the reptilians. They were surprised I wasn't afraid of them. Someone had removed my inhibitions and fears. A side effect was losing genuine interest in things. The misery remained, though. I was down in Heaven, and I was down on the reptilian spaceship. In both places, I kept thinking: when do I get out of here?

Earthly Worlds

Earthly worlds sabotaged by body-snatching orcs all have familiar system. Namely, satanism or something like it. A system with lays and satanists. Those who are in the "club", and those who aren't. Through satanism - or a similar path - one can rise to higher ranks, but in the end, there's a price to pay. The orcs themselves suffer throughout their lives. They've merely adapted to constant frustration.

Earth is apparently somewhat unusual in that it has multiple countries and rulers. Typically, a world has just one king or leader surrounded by a court and web of power players. Everyone must bow to the king. Or alternatively, the world is ruled by pure anarchy.

How common is Earth's "club" model, then? It could just as well be that there is no hierarchical club at all, and instead, each individual is responsible for themselves - learning magic to the extent that they're willing or able.

Of course, in various societies, it's common for some to suffer for the benefit of others. For example, Africa is clearly kept in poverty so others can live in abundance. Finnish Swedes maintain their culture by making the Finnish-speaking population pay the bill.

Satanism is based on poisoning and ignorance. People are kept stupid. Brain tricks are difficult to learn without some black magic, because human brain is so poisoned. In other words, without satanism human is nothing but a helpless fool. Can it really be so that the same culture of poisoning reigns in all these earthly worlds?

Nothing lasts forever. The club hasn't always existed either. It was created gradually. Think of the indigenous people of the Sentinel Islands. How could the satanic power reach people still living in a stone-age-level isolation? Well, an American businessman Samuel O'Neill claimed he visited the islands and brought satanism there. In any case, the club and satanism are two separate things. There can be satanism without the club. And a club without satanism is also possible. Such a club could simply be called a mafia.

Earthly worlds - of which there are thousands - are separate from the ufo worlds, such as the so-called heaven and other distant realms. Orcs can't enter heaven or the ufo worlds in general. They often have little to no understanding of the laws and principles that govern such ufo realms. The two worlds are fundamentally so different: the earthly world and the world of ufos.

That said, there is evil in the ufo world too: exploitation, mockery, and malice. Ufos can be downright nasty. They are not benevolent Samaritans. It might even be that they just don't like humans, simply because humans are so ugly, on the inside. Most people are, internally, quite hideous. And those who are not tend to be little more than naive losers.

The Truth About Fishing

Ufos don't want to be in direct contact with humans. A direct line of communication would only lead to humans constantly asking for advice about everything - after all, ufo knows everything better. This in turn would result in ufo making all decisions on human's behalf. Humans are meant to live (seemingly) independent life. They have free will, and with that, the responsibility for their actions - some more, some less.

Rather than giving someone a fish, ufo would rather offer a fishing rod. Actually, the rod isn't handed to you, but it's possible to obtain it. The problem is that human doesn't even know it exists, and would not know how to fish with it anyway. For most people, it would be enough if someone drove them to the fish market.

Dumb and Dumber

Humans are doomed to wander in darkness. There are individuals for whom, in principle, anything is possible. But in practice, their minds have been harnessed for daily toil and vulgar banalities of leisure time. It's a shame. Many people are spiritually capable without realizing it. And if someone like that isn't part of the club - that is, the satanic alliance - they are most likely targeted individuals and as such poisoned into dullness.

Human is a psycho-physical being. Physical and mental well-being go hand in hand. If one wishes to pursue spirituality, they must first cleanse their body. That could be achieved by sticking to a clean diet, free of industrially processed foods. Substances like fluoride, aluminum, and other toxins - which clog the pineal gland - must be avoided. An alkaline, stimulant-free diet also promotes bodily purity, and through that, mental clarity. Meditation helps to calm the mind and improve focus.

People are being systematically poisoned from all directions on an unbelievable scale. The entire food industry is designed to dumb people down. It's an orc project - one that ensures only a rare few are able to perceive them. Such people are impossible to poison because their brain is somehow rewired, perhaps after an injury.

Poisoning is also part of the satanic agenda aimed at turning humanity into a herd of cattle - none of whom are capable of grasping the bigger picture. Only those at the higher levels of the satanic power pyramid are meant to know. Even they are not really allowed to think. Their minds are enslaved as well, forced to generate pleasure for the top of the pyramid - where no humans reside.

The goal of the satanic system is a reality where everything is a lie. Everything is upside down. And it doesn't matter if the few who are awake refuse to accept it - as long as they understand to stay obediently silent. It's almost scary how similar it is to the ufo system. Perhaps there is no good and evil. Just dumb and dumber.

About Demons

When you read someone is getting advice from angels, it is probably demons in disguise. Ufos - beings we might regard as angels - typically don't communicate directly with humans; they offer only hints. Demons, on the other hand, like to present themselves as spirit-guides, leading people astray and toying with them.

Demons are superior entities compared to human, so they should not be summoned - especially since they are hard to get rid of. At first, demons flirt and amuse, then they start to mock. Soon, you're being tormented by ten of them. The closer you let one in, the tighter its grip becomes. You don't just hear voices anymore - demons can manifest physically: jolting you awake, inducing arrhythmia-like pulses, even radiation-like pain. The constant noise alone prevents sleep, driving you to the brink of madness. Insomnia is not something you can adapt to - the sheer lack of sleep destroys sanity. Suicide might not help either; it might even worsen the situation. Because of demons – a real, present phenomena in this world - all forms of spiritism and summoning are extremely risky.

Demons are often mixed with Voice-to-Skull (V2K) technology and various microwave weapons. Many lays are tortured with V2K weapons as part of "gang stalking" - the systematic persecution of a single person. The victim can also be someone involved in the club who refused to carry out some assignment - such as murder or rape.

A demon might offer lots of useful advice, but when a human begins to trust it, it betrays them when it matters most. You shouldn't listen to or believe voices inside your head. They can be entertaining company, but you can't rely on them.

Otherworldly entity – ufo, demon or whatever – can also manipulate human by instilling ideas. This is a huge phenomenon and it happens everywhere all the time. Ufos can easily plant ideas in human minds - making people think they hold a certain opinion, then act on it. However, ufos prefer that humans make the real decision out of their own free will, because such a decision holds more value. For small matters, ufos may direct people at life's crossroads. But major decisions should be made independently. Voices - demons and others - harm you greatly here. They interject in minor choices only to sabotage big ones. Or maybe big decisions are irrelevant to them - but they still want to be involved.

Those who have opened astral-realm gateways must carefully consider their decisions on important matters. Decisions must be made with reason, not emotion. That doesn't mean building your thinking solely on so-called hard values.

Spiritual Ants

As humans, also ufos live within their own limited reality. You could compare humans to ants and ufos to humans. If human don't care about ants, he wouldn't stomp on an ant hill either. But it's not like that with ufos. They do intervene in human life.

Because of ufos, nothing on Earth is what it seems. Anything can be removed or added. Ufos see humans as small creatures whose understanding is insufficient. We are easy to fool and use. Thus, the ufo's attitude toward human is not quite the same as that of human toward ant or, for example, game animals, whose populations are monitored and culled. After all, humans don't mess with moose just for fun. Then again, humans can't see what moose are thinking. If they could, maybe they would mess with them.

In ufo eyes, people are spiritually filthy – never noble, but always base. Humans are stupid and ugly at heart, or naïve and vulnerable. People are also easy to manipulate. Humans are avatars not just for orcs. Decisions of world leaders are manipulated from Ufoland, and unwanted consequences are fixed afterward. It seems like the world isn't allowed to change too fast - or to be utterly destroyed (e.g., by nuclear war) either. It can be a sick place - perhaps it must be.

I would guess that ufos see themselves as saviours. Without their aid, the human world would be an utter toilet. Humans are totally incapable of defending or warring against extra terrestrials. That's why the whole planet is covered with a dome that is located outside the atmosphere. Not just anyone can come here to enslave humans. The access is regulated by a cosmic border control.

Maybe humans' heaven is Ufoland, and the (lost) paradise lies within the hollow interior of the Earth. Earthly existence, the surface world, is the "kingdom of Satan", at least for now. It's ok to visit here "as a bird from another world", but it's not a good deal to incarnate here. I wouldn't recommend it to anyone. Still, it might be the only way to truly make a difference. Someone must be in the field doing the dirty work.

Human reality needs to have internal logic. The Mandela Effect exists, but it's not very common. It occurs when ufos alter reality retroactively - rewinding the tape or swapping a detail, which then becomes part of history but doesn't match collective memory. This phenomenon is difficult to explain when you don't even understand how it works. The human understanding of time is somehow very limited. At least mine is.

Science measures probabilities – and also guesses. Like I do, too. I can't go to the library or the Internet to learn about ufos - I can only infer from my own experiences. Sure, there's literature on ghosts, aliens, and galactic conspiracies, but you never know what's true. I've read a few David Icke books - he could be more concise. And where does he get his ideas? Not from textbooks. Someone planted the ideas into his head, and he fleshed them out.

Never Tell

There are demons and ufos, and then there are products of imagination. If you imagine hearing voices, you soon start to actually hear them. Imagination plays tricks on you. You may find yourself talking and boxing with yourself - and that's fine. What bothers me are those who, upon hearing voices, immediately turn to medication. I see that as the last resort. Doctors are instructed to prescribe antidepressants for just about anything. A frustration becomes diagnosed depression. Anything hinting at the paranormal is treated as insanity.

Never tell doctors anything about spiritual matters. Most of them are orcs who have been trained to destroy anyone who sees or hears more. I understand that if you can't sleep, you might be forced to take medication.

But it's available at the liquor store. In my view, a bottle is better than antidepressants. Other remedies: work, exercise, and social interaction.

Healthcare professionals - like nurses or midwives - are very often orcs too. When a baby is born, their first sight is a terrifying creature: an orc. Its job is to begin poisoning and blinding immediately. If a newborn's aura glows extra blue, they are eliminated with particular care. A capable human is an enemy to the orcs.

Today, Earth is largely ruled by orcs, and their hegemony depends on humans failing to see their true nature. Though orcs generally compete with one another, they unite here. So nothing esoteric is helped by healthcare. Those worlds must be kept apart. Also, that the satanic "whore machine" - the human mob practicing gang stalking and terror - is vast, covering healthcare, judiciary, education, and bureaucracies. Anyone resisting the satanic system quickly sees how hard life can get. These days, the world of humans is largely ruled by orcs, and their hegemony depends on the fact that people fail to see their true nature.

Ufos find it easy to plant ideas directly into human thought. They can make a person believe that a certain opinion is their own, and act accordingly. Yet ufos prefer to let humans make the "right" decision of their own free will. Such a choice carries greater value. In smaller matters, they may guide a person at life's crossroads. But the important decisions should be made independently. Demons and other inner voices are a serious obstacle in this. They interfere in trivial decisions only to gain access and sabotage the crucial ones. Or perhaps what seems important to humans is meaningless to them, and what matters is simply to stay involved at all times.

Those who have opened gateways to the astral world should think carefully about how to act when facing major questions. Decisions should be made with reason rather than emotion. This does not mean one should base their thinking solely on so-called hard values. A rational decision often takes others into account and seeks fairness. Greed and envy are self-sustaining emotions whose motivating power should never be allowed too much influence.

Karma Laundry

Rather than listening to voices, humans must live a human life. Sadly, people have been so thoroughly poisoned that they can't even do that without help from above or from "below". Human life is, all in all, a bad deal: to survive, you must destroy or at least subjugate others. That leads to new reincarnations, through which you cleanse your karma so your soul can continue its journey. And all this for what? It would be easier and more fulfilling to lead one short life, die contentedly, and be done. After all, a new life is someone else's life, as you must enter it through a veil of forgetfulness. Accordingly, your life is too. Or do you consider yourself responsible for your predecessor's actions?

Karma is merciful in that it assesses a human's life holistically. It recognizes life's relativity. You don't have to be a good person if you're useful. Diligence can sometimes outweigh righteousness. Someone could be a lousy scoundrel their whole life but, in a moment of crisis, rise above themselves and their fears. That might be far more valuable than lifelong moral virtue.

A twisted, cynical mind that still strives to act altruistically is forgiven much by karma. Even if you're weak, you must consider your actions and strive toward better. You can't wallow in misery or seek only self-interest. A wise person thinks of themselves and others, building bridges and helping people. It's easy to destroy and rage - but many things yield better results with some thoughtful care. To be fair, I don't really know how to live a human life. I'm a layman - just an ignorant fool. I'm not even a bridge-builder. All this philosophizing is more theory than practice.

It's possible that a suffering lay was an evil satanist in the past life, and now experiences the consequences. Or the chance to cleanse karma through suffering that benefits others. Perhaps almost everyone eventually receives what they deserve. Seen that way, the system is perfect, and needs no change. Everyone is the master of their own fate - responsible for their actions and primarily for themselves and their children, maybe others close to them. Helping others might, in fact, violate the system, if it comes from expecting something in return.

Then again, everyone needs help sometimes. If you pick up a shard of glass from the road, it might keep someone from stepping on it. Wouldn't you want someone to do the same for you - even if you didn't deserve it, and even if stepping on it would have kind of served you right? And maybe a ufo decides not to help you, because you didn't help your neighbor in need. That, in turn, might mean the ufo doesn't get help from a higher mega-ufo, even if he needs it. He just doesn't realize he needs help. So what goes around - if not evil, then at least indifference - comes around. Apathy spreads.

The world is divided into two energies: positive and negative. The more people (and ufos) think and act negatively, the stronger that energy grows - and vice versa. Thus, you can reduce Satan's power by acting in selfless and positive ways.

But in human society, diplomacy isn't enough - you must defend yourself. Often the best defense is offense: strike when the enemy least expects it, with maximum force, so they learn to fear you and avoid further conflict. Even pacifist must sometimes strike back. You don't tame a bully by reacting to provocations, you strike first. Questions are answered with counterquestions, not by lowering yourself to respond.

The world moves forward through conflict. Humans are meant to develop their world. It would be boring if it remained unchanged. That's why ufos forgive proactive humans their bad deeds. Kindness doesn't get you far here. All dignitaries and other prominent figures belong to the club, torturing innocent people to fulfill themselves. Behind this evil philosophy is the Devil, or maybe it's someone else.

High-level mega-ufos may use these ultra-demons as their tools. In order to keep the world in constant motion - dynamic and changing - Satan and his allies must stir up conflict and provoke humans against one another. This is also why a debt-driven market economy prevails, based on a Jewish idea of money as a tool of control. And in the human world, honest labor is never allowed to be as rewarding as raping little kids. The world is not developed collectively toward something better, because that wouldn't make for an interesting show. The ufos want drama. They don't particularly care about humans. No one cares about people, or even like us. Maybe we should just go extinct.
